

pants to build a national database of bibliographic and holdings information for newspapers published in the United States. The program will provide access to newspapers and preserve them through microfilming. The Georgia Newspaper Project began in the 1950s as an effort to preserve Georgia's newspapers on microfilm. By 1985 five hundred and seventy titles on over 8,000 reels had been microfilmed. The University Libraries retain the master negatives as well as a positive working copy for each title. In addition to providing the means for achieving the main objectives of the USNP, the NEH grant will allow the University of Georgia Libraries to host a number of planning workshops throughout the state. These workshops will provide a method for involving county officials, librarians, individuals, historical and genealogical societies in the planning for Georgia's participation in this program.

• The University of Missouri-Columbia Libraries have received a $202,757 grant from the U.S. Department of Education to improve the availability of special collections. The 15-month grant will be used to improve bibliographic access to approximately 21,000 pre-1800 imprints through the national online union catalog operated by OCLC. Approximately 5,200 titles will be treated. In addition, the university has been awarded a $3,000 faculty/librarian research grant from the Council on Library Resources. Grant funds will be used for the study, "Investigating the Effects of Human Factors on the Outcome of a Library Computer Literacy Program," a follow-up to the UMC Libraries' H.W. Wilson Staff Development Award project on computer literacy. The new study will explore and document staff perceptions and attitudes toward computer technology after completing the computer literacy program.

• The University of Wisconsin School of Library and Information Studies, Madison, has been awarded a $148,000 grant from the U.S. Department of Education to study the role of literacy education of secondary school, community college, academic, public, state, and state institutional libraries. A nationwide survey coupled with nine exemplary program case studies form the basis of the study which will result in the development of a projected role for libraries in literacy education. The project report will be delivered to the DOE in June 1987.

Real income, comparable worth, and other activities of the College Libraries Section.

How much would you be willing to pay for a professional with a master's degree, who was familiar with a variety of information retrieval systems—including computer-based data banks...who could supervise a large staff, develop and implement a budget, and actively market the service—and handle building maintenance problems? Sound like a high five-figure job? How about $15,000?" The Christian Science Monitor asked this question last year in an article about librarians' new skills.

The $15,000 figure hurts. It is typical for college librarians. Even if each entering librarian were independently wealthy it still would hurt. The comparably low pay still would devalue our work in relation to others.

An instructor with me at Berkeley, Lois Harzfeld, pointed out the Library Journal interviews in which most librarians would not have minded leaving the field, and the New Republic article on real income for different occupations (librarians were second from the bottom, just above welfare recipients). "Why doesn't any library organization address that problem?" she asked.

My first chance to address that problem is now. The question of real income is close to comparable worth, in that some occupations generate more real income for doing less work. Also, the status of librarians as faculty members is close to that of comparable worth, in that librarians and classroom professors are of comparable worth in the college setting, and thus should be comparably treated.

Comparably, not equally. When librarians are treated equally with classroom faculty, the things we do as they do them are judged by their standards, while the things we do as we do them are judged by their standards. The result is that, as one
